Abstract

This article examines some characteristics and functions of multiplex tactics in small storytelling. It uses a case study based on three long informal interviews with a participant from the Global South Africa. Analysis and discussion raise questions of conventional processes and involvement and thereby of a critical understanding of creativity and co-operation in interactional doing being. Multiplex tactics produce effects on several levels of interactional and discursive organization simultaneously: signalling participative and narrative framing, linking and siting, while also affecting story matter and style, or providing coherence between several elements. An example, multiplexity, is a resource for accessing narrative meaning-making and narrative re-construction. Furthermore, it contributes to the real body of work on individuality and discourse-making. The article focuses on the creative, affective, and evaluative nature of evaluation in interactional work.
